PASSAGE 1:

In Taylor's 1911 The Principles of Scientific Management, he specified that workers should be paid in accordance with the mental and physical difficulty of the task. Each individual was to be paid according to his or her own output (rather than on the output of the group, which Taylor believed led to "systematic soldiering"). Jobs that were especially taxing physically or mentally were to be remunerated more generously than those that were not. Selection was particularly important; finding the people best suited for particular tasks (as structured by managers) was thought to benefit the organization and its workers alike.

Scientific management places a heavy responsibility on managers—perhaps the strongest manifestation of a "right to manage" in twentieth-century management thought—to structure work properly and to devise a set of rewards that align workers' interests with the organization's. The frequent accusation made against scientific management is that it led to the exploitation of workers; the phenomenon of rate cutting, for example, was ever-present in the minds of both workers and critics. There is, however, a clear difference between the theory of scientific management and its use; if manufacturers in the early part of this century had followed Taylor's counsel on remuneration more closely, many of the objections to scientific management would have been abated.

11- The underlined word "generously" in paragraph 1 is closest in meaning to …… .

1) open-handedly 2) single-handedly
3) smartly 4) briefly

12- The underlined word "it" in paragraph 2 refers to …… .

1) frequent accusation 2) scientific management
3) organization 4) reward

13- All of the following words are mentioned in the passage EXCEPT …….. .

1) critics 2) mental 3) manifestation 4) moral

14- According to paragraph 1, Taylor thought that "systematic soldiering" was a result of …… .

1) paying individuals on the basis of their mental and physical problems
2) not paying individuals with mental and physical problems
3) paying individuals on the basis of the group's output
4) paying individuals according to their personal output

15- According to the passage, which of the following statements is true?

1) Taylor believed that people whose jobs are especially demanding were to receive higher wages.
2) In scientific management, rewards should prioritize the worker's interests over those of the organizations'.
3) Many manufacturers in the early 20th century objected to Taylor's theory of scientific management.
4) In fact, there was no significant gap between the theory and practice of scientific management in the 20th century.

PASSAGE 2:

By its simplest definition, workforce management refers to all of the processes and activities needed to maintain a productive workforce. As a business discipline, workforce management comprises several distinct areas, including time and attendance tracking, staff scheduling, absence and leave tracking and compliance, employment-law compliance, and the emerging area of fatigue risk management. Although workforce-management transactions have been automated for decades—dating back to the once-ubiquitous punch-clock—the discipline has evolved dramatically in recent years and is now used in savvy organizations and HR functions to measure and improve labor effectiveness and efficiency.

As workforce-management technology becomes more advanced, it enables organizations to automate a larger portion of critical labor activities, freeing up time for other strategic initiatives. In addition, the detailed information provided by these software solutions gives employers much greater visibility and insight into their workforce processes, which enables them to operate more nimbly and make better-informed decisions based on actual data. The employers that move beyond the long-standing "punch-in/punch-out" approach to workforce management and implement the tools and processes that enable them to better align employee schedules, activities, and costs with business objectives are the most likely to see measurable gains.

In light of factors such as an increasingly aggressive regulatory environment and increased global competition, organizations have been forced to reevaluate their workforce-management systems and strategies with an eye toward more robust automation and greater coverage for compliance requirements.

16- The underlined word "savvy" in paragraph 1 is closest in meaning to …… .
1) convulsive 2) recreational 3) malign 4) perceptive

17- According to paragraph 1, among the areas encompassed within workforce management …….. .
1) none is in need of urgent change more than the area of fatigue risk management
2) the area of fatigue risk management is a relatively more recent one than the others
3) only workforce-management transactions such as punch-clock have been automated so far
4) the punch-clock is the only transaction which was and is still present in each and every work environment

18- According to paragraph 2, software solutions for workforce management …….. .
1) help employers in automating a larger part of activities such as strategic initiatives
2) create a better and more acceptable image of the employer in the eyes of the employees
3) provide employers with facts which could help them in the process of decision making
4) supply employers with general information which can later be processed by the workforce

19- According to the passage, which of the following statements is NOT true?
1) One of the main functions of workforce management is the measurement and enhancement of work efficacy.
2) Organizations need to reassess their workforce-management systems and strategies in the face of some external pressures.
3) Time and attendance tracking, staff scheduling, and employment-law compliance can all be subsumed under workforce management.
4) The automation of workforce transactions is a concept which has emerged in recent years, dealing mainly with allocation of financial resources.

20- The passage provides sufficient information to answer which of the following questions?
1) In what year did workforce management become a business discipline?
2) Has there been any change in workforce management in recent times?
3) Who first introduced the concept of workforce management?
4) What is the definition of the "punch-in/punch-out" approach?

PASSAGE 3:

Public health managers have never carried the popular esteem accorded their professional colleagues who are seen to be the 'real' providers of health care. In many situations they are seen, not only as a distraction, but also as a hindrance to the pursuit of health care delivery—the builders of bureaucratic hurdles to clinical practice. This poor public image exists despite the fact that many such managers have a health professional background and have a career background with strong 'hands on' experience. [1]

Yet health managers are essential contributors to the effective performance of health systems. They provide the framework within which health services can be delivered. [2] Health managers within low-income countries face significant challenges in developing and managing the appropriate system for addressing the major health problems faced by these countries. Moreover, the environment within which they work is rapidly changing. [3] Epidemiological and demographic changes, such as the HIV/AIDS epidemic, and the growing importance in many countries of noncommunicable diseases, require shifts in health system resource allocations and delivery responses.

Furthermore, managers are expected to respond to these challenges at a time when resources are particularly tight and often unpredictable. Other contextual factors including donor policies, general government public sector reforms, and the effects of increasing globalization all impose additional challenges on the health systems and their managers. [4] Effective responses to these challenges require a cadre of managers and planners equipped to provide strategic direction to the system, to ensure the provision of appropriate services and to link with other organizations and sectors in the pursuit of better health.

21- According to paragraph 1, public health managers …….. .

1) do not enjoy the public respect accorded to others involved in the field of health care such as practicing physicians
2) are seen not as a distraction, but as a facilitating factor in the pursuit of health care delivery in many situations
3) are only regarded as the builders of bureaucratic hurdles to clinical practice by poor people
4) are not taken seriously since almost all of them lack practical expertise in the area of health care

22- Which of the following techniques has been used in paragraph 2?

1) Definition
2) Quotation
3) Exemplification
4) Irony

23- According to paragraph 3, in order to respond effectively to the challenges facing them, managers need to ..... .

1) ensure the provision of appropriate services while avoiding any overlaps with other organizations and sectors
2) understand that contextual factors are extremely more important than employing well-equipped managers and planners
3) neglect contextual factors, such as general government public sector reforms and the effects of increasing globalization
4) provide strategic direction to the system, ascertain the delivery of appropriate services, and connect with other institutions and divisions

24- Which of the following words best describes the writer's attitude to public health managers in the passage?

1) Ambivalence
2) Disapproval
3) Approval
4) Indifference

25- In which position marked by [1], [2], [3] and [4], can the following sentence best be inserted in the passage?

The availability of support staff, drugs, equipment and buildings, without which health care could not be delivered, are all 'management' responsibilities.

1) [1]
2) [2]
3) [3]
4) [4]
